Lo-Fi Prototype Design Choices

To design this page, I looked at other shopping cart pages that I have used before (outdoorvoices.com and freepeople.com) and reflected some of my favorite components from them in my design. I wanted to make the page very clean and simple in line with the browsing and product detail pages, given that there is a good amount of information I didn't want it to be too cluttered. I also kept consistency with the large orange button for check out that mimics the add to bag button on the product detail page and the shop all products button on the home page. My goal here is that the user will be naturally drawn to these buttons because they stand out and are consistent and easily understandable throughout the site. I also decided to keep the "more items you might like" section that I have on my product detail page because I appreciated this on the sites I looked at and it might make the user more likely to discover more products on the site.

Hi-Fi Prototype Design Choices

Apart from the decisions I made in the Lo-Fi prototype, I decided to change the dropdown quantity selector to a type-in do provide more freedom to the user. I also moved the price to the top and the quantity to the bottom of the product section because I felt it was more intuitive and clearer to have the price in line with the other details about the product.
